Desktop Web Wireframes

Round 3

Wireframe Overview

Please read before proceeding.

This document contains product wireframes. Wireframes are intended to illustrate the overall structure of a product, but NOT the final look and feel of a product. This means that all of the elements in this document will be represented on screen in the final product but will look different aesthetically as the final creative treatment is applied during a later phase of design. Please keep this in mind when reviewing/approving this document.

Generally speaking, wireframes represent the following accurately:

- Screen content: This will likely include placeholder content
- Screen flow: How each screen flows to the next
- General layout: How items on screen may be arranged
- Relative font sizes: Which text items are high/low priority
- UI control types: Which types of interface elements are used (for example, a button, a slider, a checkbox, etc.)
- Approximate placement/sizing of pictures and icons (although there is flexibility for this during creative)
- Screen/module states: Different states of screen elements based on user/interactions, windows/pop-ups, etc.

Wireframes DO NOT represent the following accurately (these items will be finalized in the creative phase):

- Design language: Establishing the rules for an overall look and feel that is consistent throughout the product
- Specific layouts: While general layouts are recommended in the wireframing stage, they will be finalized in creative
- Fonts: Look and feel of all text elements
- Colors: The color palette and rules for color use are established for the product
- Icons: A style for icons is established and all icons are finalized
- Images: Final images/photos are created as necessary

If you have any questions on the purpose of this document or what is expected of you when reviewing it, please don't hesitate to contact us.

Excellent!

Your employees were all friendly and helpful. Check in was easy and convenient as you forwarded me the pass code before arrival. We met several employees from the Palms and they were also friendly and helpful. The condo was clean, neat, well maintained and well appointed. We didn't need anything except groceries. We are planning another visit for next year and we will be in touch.
